Oct 24, 2019City officials are looking at a couple of proposals to deal with the 2.7 acre property and have not decided if a court can throw out one or both of the proposals. “I am not sure how you can judge the individual plans in a vacuum without knowing what is behind the plans,” Powers said. “Certainly people have had concerns about the traffic and parking and that has not been addressed. “I don’t think the judge can just judge the plans in a vacuum. I think he should take all those things into consideration and decide what is best for the property.” But the park district and residents are counting on the judge to help them turn the property, which is in an industrial section of Chicago’s southwest side, into a park. It’s in the 5800 block of South Indiana Avenue, east of 35th and west of 35th. The area has become a hub for gangs in the area, especially MS-13. In the spring of 2017, Chicago police began a major crackdown on gang activity and made a series of arrests of gang members. The park district wants to turn the property into a park and recreation center, ideally to address the park district’s issues with flooding. But the park district has presented another option to the court. The park district wants to turn the property into a recreational park that includes four baseball fields, four soccer fields and other amenities for activities, like arts and crafts or a climbing wall. The park district has given the court a letter from an engineering consulting firm that said it was possible to build all of the facilities in the park district’s preferred option for the property. But the park district also asked for a stay of the court’s approval of the architect’s plan while the park district changed its plan. “We have heard from some members that they feel the park district is trying to convince the judge that they really don’t have a problem with the property not being turned into a park,” Powers said. “I don’t think the park district is being dishonest.” But a park district spokesman said the park district f678ea9f9e
